The Hameau Book of Fighter Pilot Jon E. Lewis 01-11-04 From yeaterdays flighters moving to todays tug, The Marmottons have been described as "a motley crew of soldiers" and "a motley crew of soldiers and a motley crew of soldiers."

The Israeli soldiers, battle-hardened by years of war, are described in the book as "the best of the best". They are shown as being highly trained, disciplined and willing to do whatever it takes to achieve their objectives.

The book also describes the soldiers' experience of the final offensive of the war as the allies were at last able to 'put the German Army to the sword'. The soldiers are shown as being determined and resolute, with a strong sense of duty and a willingness to risk their lives in order to achieve their goals.

In addition to describing the soldiers' battle experience, the book also includes a number of images and diagrams, including a map of the battlefield and a diagram of the battle's key positions. These visuals help to illustrate the scale and complexity of the battle, and provide a useful tool for understanding the soldiers' experience.

Overall, "Bourlon Wood" is a detailed and informative account of the battle, providing a unique insight into the soldiers' experiences and the tactical decisions that were made during the fighting. It is a valuable resource for those interested in military history, and a powerful reminder of the courage and sacrifice of those who fought in this important battle.

Battle Story: Cambrai 1917

Chris McNab 2012-02-29

The Battle of Cambrai has become synonymous with one of the Allies’ first large-scale use of tanks on the Western Front. Cambrai certainly saw over 450 Mark IV tanks lumber across No Man’s Land and penetrate the Hindenburg Line. For the Germans on the other side of these defences the sheer scale of these ‘iron monsters’ was terrifying, however they quickly rallied and the battle was about much more than the tanks deployed. Chris McNab explores how new techniques of sound-ranging and artillery strategy played a greater part on the battlefield than the tanks which have dominated the history of the battle. At dawn on 20 November 1917 over 1,000 guns fired on German positions and 400 tanks and thousands of men stepped out into the barren land between the trenches. At first, it seemed that success was inevitable, with over 5 miles of ground gained – a significant amount for such an operation; however on the first day of battle 180 tanks were out of action and the attack began to flounder. After days of attack and counterattack, both sides had gained ground, but no definitive success with over 70,000 casualties. Yet, Cambrai was an important training ground for both sides, proving the effectiveness of new tactics that would lead to greater victories later in the war.
